

next spoke of Mr. Westcott who he said had served in the Federal army until his health failed, when he had settled in Alexandria, and cast his fortunes with her's. His speech to-night had shown that he was fully competent to manage his own cause, while Mr. Ware had to have some one to speak for him. He denied the charge that there was any animosity between the Reform party and the Military authorities and said that those who had tried to oust Gen. Slough belonged to the side of their opponents. One reform needed, said the speaker, was a proper protection to all "loyal men;" and all who were willing to return to their allegiance to the Federal Government must be treated leniently; taken by the hand and said to, with Mr. Lincoln, "return brother and sin no more." He next alluded to the Hall, dedicated to Liberty; yet he had not the right to make a few remarks in it, without being attacked under the assumed name of "Yankee." The speaker then produced a copy of the Virginia Sentinel of Jan. 29th, 1861, in which was a report of a meeting addressed by Mr. Massey, in which, in response to an inquiry, he is reported as saying "If Virginia went out, he would go with her—that his interests and hopes were with her," &c., the reading of which caused great laughter, and much applause. Mr. Miner said he could not vouch for the truthfulness of the report, but as he had heard persons denounced as liars for repeating the same thing, and he thought he would read it from the paper. After a eulogy upon the character of Washington who he said belonged to the whole country, and an appeal in behalf of the Reform ticket, Mr. M. took his seat.

Mr. Westcott repeated the qualifications of a voter and said that as there was some difficulty about the enrollment of the names by the Assessors, Mr. Henderson being willing and Mr. Davy not, that if all who wanted to vote, and had the other qualifications, would leave their names with him, he would see that the matter was properly attended to, that all who were entitled to a vote under the law should exercise the privilege, and that no obstruction should be thrown in their way by unwilling officers. After inquiring if any of the opposition party desired to answer anything that had been said, no response, being made, the meeting was declared adjourned.
